

The arrival in Europe of a mass of people who flee their countries of origin due to war and other situations of danger for their lives and liberties, in addition to the flux of migrants compelled to leave their countries because of poverty, has become a major challenge for Europe. Indeed, social integration, intercultural dialogue, mutual respect, on one hand, and, on the other, measures to prevent and combat illegal immigration fueled by criminal organizations, as well as to respond effectively to terrorism risks connected with conflicts on the south bank of the Mediterranean (Middle-East and African area), are all intertwined factors and aspects of a scenario in which is at stake the future of the European project of peace and prosperity. In view of the challenge thus posed and upon which it also depends the challenge of peaceful coexistence and worldwide sustainable development, EU member states and institutions are called to act in a responsive way that implies the responsibility to deepen and spread knowledge about the issues involved, in order to have a better understanding of viable solutions in terms of political choices concerning the European citizens. To this regard, university cooperation, through the involvement of research and study centres, with the participation of experts, and civil society organizations, can bring about a significant contribution of analysis, suggestions and proposals.

In gathering together scholars, young researchers, experts, as well as institutional and civil society representatives, in order to offer an opportunity to reflect and discuss on such matters, while urging the attention of competent authorities, in particular at European level, the Seminar* is aimed to analyze causes and types of migration flows and their socio-economic, legal and political impact, to collect study materials on the phenomenon, to advance proposals for managing it, and to contribute to promote a greater sense of awareness and responsibility on the side of EU countries based on shared values and common interests and a true spirit of solidarity and mutual trust.
